

Warrior Trails

Although to many the word "underground" when associated with a newspaper connotes anything but ethical journalism, Mr. Michael Duckworth, adviser of Smoke Signals, believes that "there are two kinds of underground newspapers, the responsible and the irresponsible."

Similar beliefs were voiced by a page editor on West's paper who remarked, "I don't think they should be used for printing negative attitudes about the administration or a positive attitude on drugs."

The underground paper can be effective if its publishers distinguish between a responsible and irresponsible paper. Too many papers, with a one-edition life span, are only printed to see what they can get away with and to needlessly shock readers. These are the publications which are not worthwhile in the first place.

Although usually triggered by the same reasons, extreme censorship or an unexplainable action, the similarities of the two different underground papers stops here. A responsible underground newspaper can be developed as an additional source of communication for the student body. Students who participate as writers feel free, while maintaining certain ethics and using intelligence.

At times the student body itself may be behind the newspaper. At other times a dissatisfied staff may be the springboard. "Underground newspapers," according to a school paper editor, "are direct insults to the existing staff, who has been working faithfully for the student body." When the conditions the staff encounters stifles everything and nothing is tolerated, free expression then becomes necessary.

An underground paper without stipulations that it must follow, except to remain within the boundaries of good taste, can give the pro and cons to issues without the fear of harassment. An authorized newspaper which expresses opinion is slanted in one direction while the unauthorized may express both views forcibly.

When this method of communication must be resorted to, publications should follow some kind of a flexible guide. In this way the underground newspaper can become a definite asset.
